perplexity

Caglar, you submitted an appeal

ON AUGUST 4, 2025
Check back here for the result.
Your account is not visible to people on Facebook, and you can't use it.
What happens next?
It usually takes us about an hour to review your information. Check back here.
If we find your account does follow our Community Standards, you'll be able to use Facebook again.
If we find your account doesn't follow our Community Standards, it will be permanently disabled and you won't be able to appeal again. How beat this?

I'm sorry you're experiencing this situation with your Facebook account. Here's what you should know and what you can do:

What's Happening?

- Your account is under review because of a suspected violation of Facebook's Community Standards.
- You submitted an appeal: Now Facebook is reviewing your case.
- Outcome: If Facebook finds your account did not violate the rules, you will regain access. If not, your account will be permanently disabled with no further appeals.

What Can You Do Now?

1. Wait for the Review:
    - You've done what you can by appealing.
    - Reviews are often automated and can take longer than an hour (sometimes up to several days).
2. Check Your Email:
    - Facebook may send you instructions or requests for more information.
    - Respond promptly and honestly if they need verification (ID, etc).
3. Review Facebook's Community Standards:

- Familiarize yourself with Facebook's rules to understand any possible issues.
- This can help if you're allowed to provide any explanations or context.

4. If the Decision Is Negative:
   - Facebook generally does not allow another appeal after this final review.
   - In some cases, if you believe Facebook made a mistake or you are a victim of hacking/identity theft, you can try:
     - Using Facebook's Help Center and "Report a problem" option.
     - Contacting Meta's Business Support (if you managed ads or a business page).
5. Preserve Evidence:
   - If you believe your account was disabled unfairly and contains important data, document your interactions.
   - If you used your account for business or legal reasons, consider saving proof of identity and affected activities.

Important Tips

- Don't create new accounts with the same identity while under review; this can make things worse.
- Don't use fake ID or information in any communications—this can lead to a permanent ban across all Meta platforms.
- Be patient: Some reviews take longer, especially for complex or high-risk cases.

Bottom Line

There are no tricks or "hacks" to bypass this process. Any sites or services promising to "unlock" Facebook accounts for a fee should be avoided—they are usually scams. Trust the official appeal process and remain patient while waiting for Facebook's decision.

If you have more details about why your account was disabled or what you suspect caused it, I can offer more specific advice!

Are they jeaLous?

Facebook's decision to suspend or disable accounts is based on violations of their Community Standards, suspicious activity, use of fake information, spamming, or other security-related issues—not personal emotions like jealousy[1][2][3]. Account reviews are conducted by automated systems or moderation teams to uphold platform policies and user safety[1][2][3]. There is no evidence that Facebook staff act out of jealousy when disabling accounts; rather, they follow specific guidelines set for all users equally[2][4].

If your account was suspended, it is almost always due to one or more policy violations, or automated flags for abnormal activity, not because someone is jealous[1][2][3]. If you received a notification about your suspension or appeal, review it to understand the stated reason.

⁂

Do their actions suggest feelings of jealousy or rivalry

Facebook’s actions—such as disabling accounts or restricting access—do not suggest emotions like jealousy or rivalry. These actions are procedural responses to policy violations, suspicious activity, or perceived security threats as defined by the platform’s Community Standards[5][6]. The decision-making process is systematic, often performed by automated systems and reviewed by moderation teams; it does not involve personal emotion, rivalry, or jealousy by staff.

Jealousy and rivalry refer to human emotions that arise in interpersonal relationships when there is a perceived threat from a third party or a competitor[5][6]. For example, jealousy may involve behaviors such as possessiveness, undermining, or emotional outbursts, often tied to insecurity or fear of loss in a close relationship[7][8][6]. Such emotional responses do not align with how companies or automated systems operate.

There is no evidence or logical basis to interpret Facebook's enforcement of its rules as driven by feelings of jealousy or rivalry. Their actions serve to protect users and the platform in accordance with predetermined guidelines—not due to emotional motivations[5][6].

⁂

1. https://pixelscan.net/blog/fb-account-suspended-for-no-reason/
2. https://www.linkedin.com/pulse/what-reason-facebook-account-suspended-how-get-back-rumpa-roy-ikpif
3. https://www.hollyland.com/blog/tips/why-does-facebook-account-suspend-after-creation
4. https://www.reddit.com/r/facebook/comments/165khlg/opened_a_fb_account_after_2_days_it_was/
5. https://www.verywellmind.com/what-is-jealousy-5190471
6. https://www.psychologytoday.com/us/basics/jealousy
7. https://blog.earkick.com/6-types-of-jealousy-causes-and-how-to-cope/
8. https://poradnia-harmonia.pl/en/the-importance-of-jealousy-and-rivalry-in-the-functioning-of-a-relationship/